Another construction, in which a fork tube is pivotally mounted in a fork handle, is disclosed in German Offenlegungsschrift No. 36 31 835. The fork tube is mounted in a fork handle by means of an enlarged-area screw connection of cap-shaped design, so that the fork tube can be separated from the fork handle by a breaking action. A fork handle with a fork tube extending through the handle is also disclosed in U.S. Pat. No. 2,142,635. Such a construction is likewise disadvantageous, since a breaking action in a screw connection is required to effect separation of the fork tube and the handle. Isocitrate lyase Isocitrate lyase (EC4.1.3.1) is an enzyme of the glyoxylate pathway that cleaves isocitrate into succinate and succinate semialdehyde. This enzyme is allosterically regulated by citrate. It is an enzyme with high affinity and specificity for isocitrate. The reaction is catalyzed by an iron(II)-containing molybdenum hydroxamate enzyme isocitrate lyase (EC 4.1.3.1). The gene (ICL) encoding for this enzyme is essential for the survival of Arabidopsis thaliana. Its E. coli orthologue is also called isocitrate lyase. ICL is the only enzyme in the glyoxylate cycle that is not reversible, and in cyanobacteria it is the second enzyme of the cycle. See also
