They are often required, with the average NBA team shooting more than 120 free throws a game. Free-throw shooting is obviously the most important part of a player's offensive game. We break down the top free-throw shooting free-throw shooting moves in basketball with the help of NBA video. 1. Mid-step up The most difficult free-throw shot for someone who doesn't jump extremely high, but they are able to get off mid-step, is the go-to free-throw shooting move for most NBA players. Here is an example of an NBA player doing it right: "One of the most important things to do is mid-step up." - Phil Jackson It's pretty simple: The most difficult part is making sure that the shot doesn't go up too high. If you watch the video on this page, this is the most difficult part of the shot. The proper form for shooting free throws. From Phil Jackson's book, "Eleven Rings", the secret to success is proper form. He goes on to say that a player with appropriate form can shoot 80% of their free-throw shots. "If you look at the NBA free throw shooting chart, you'll see that the best percentage for any NBA player is around 80%, and that's what we shoot on a daily basis."

In a paper published online on 19 April 2018, the journal Nature Scientific Reports has revealed that a human brain naturally generates a signal - the so-called 'neural fingerprint' - that allows an individual to authenticate themselves with another. The US government is believed to have developed a similar capability using an identification scheme using sophisticated artificial-intelligence technologies. Chinese national director of the High-technology Innovation Team at Northeastern University Xue-Guang Liu, said that the new study and previous research with his team allowed them to demonstrate the existence of a naturally occurring neural fingerprint. "We recently found that a human brain can generate a 'neural fingerprint' for identity authentication that can be distinguished from other people's fingerprints," Liu told Xinhua News Agency. "This method completely bypasses existing face recognition and fingerprint identification techniques, it would be safe and economical to use, and the system also provides for real-time dynamic facial recognition and biometric authentication." He added that the technology could be applied in such situations as access control to high-security areas and tracking of online users. Liu said they have already sent their research results to a number of research laboratories in the United States. "We also applied the technology to the national ID card of the United States, and it could be integrated into the system to protect the personal information," he added. The scientists used high-speed magnetic resonance imaging to record the brain activity of participants to produce their 'fingerprints'. "What is astonishing is that we can identify the generated fingerprint even in those who are unconscious or sleeping," Liu said. Researchers also developed an algorithm that could automatically extract and compare the neural fingerprints of individual. "With the algorithm, the system could only need to show the individuals' facial expression, which is much simpler, more convenient and faste
