The polyamine spermidine is involved in the modulation of ASK1/2 signaling and hypoxia-inducible factors (HIF). Spermidine and its precursor putrescine inhibit both the TGF $\beta$ 1-ALK5 signaling axis and the hypoxia-induced transcription factor hypoxia-inducible factor (HIF). In hypoxia, putrescine suppresses prolyl hydroxylase activity in a spermidine oxidase-dependent manner through an increase in redox potential. As a result, HIF becomes hydroxylated and dissociates from its transcription factor p300 to translocate into the nucleus, where it activates transcription of its target genes (VEGF, HGF, and erythropoietin (Epo)) that are involved in cell proliferation, survival, survival, angiogenesis, and adaptation to hypoxia.

Little is known about the genetic basis of antibiotic resistance of Yersinia pestis, and, to our knowledge, there have been no reports of resistant strains of the plague bacillus selected in vivo. In this study, we isolated a Y. pestis mutant (Db30), resistant to streptomycin and three other antibiotics, from a flea on a Swiss alpaca. The resistant phenotype was obtained by a sequential, spontaneous (stepwise) mutation event, and was inherited in the F1 progeny. An alteration in the 23S rRNA, or its 5' end, was discovered in the resistant strain. Nevertheless, the mutated 23S was not responsible for resistance to ampicillin, chloramphenicol, kanamycin, mitomycin C, nalidixic acid and rifampicin. Analysis of the encoded proteins of the resistance determinants in resistant strain Db30 could not define the specific mechanisms conferring resistance. Because streptomycin is an anti-plague antibiotic, the resistant mutant Db30 may have potential applications as a plasmid to produce vaccines for the prevention of plague.
