[Kinetics of the generation of a specific reaction of immunoglobulins with antigen]. Kinetics of the generation of the process of specific complex formation of immunoglobulins IgG, IgM and IgA with antigen has been studied. This reaction depends on several factors, including the antigen and antibody concentrations, time intervals between the beginning of the reaction and its development, temperature, and pH. In the course of the reaction of specific complex formation between antigen and immunoglobulins there is a decrease of the kinetics parameters: maximal increase of the rate, maximum value of the maximum rate, and the order of the reaction. The temperature of the reaction has an influence on the quantity of the generated complex and its rate. Changes in the initial reagent concentrations cause a decrease of the amount of the generated complex in the course of its formation. The pH of the reaction mixture has a rather weak effect on the rate of the reaction as compared with the concentration of antigens, but it has a decisive effect on the amount of the generated complex. A study of the kinetics of the specific complex formation between IgG and antigen shows that the maximum rate of the process is reached within the first hour of the reaction. At this point the parameter "amount of the generated complex" has a value as high as that when the reaction is carried out with IgG in the presence of the greatest concentration of antigen, but the value of 6d1f23a050
