In HTML, you need to change to [Indications and treatment of the severe complications of craniofacial trauma]. Simultaneous multifocal fractures of the craniofacial bones and a transtentorial herniation are commonly associated with extremely severe neurological sequelae. Early diagnosis and an individual treatment concept are based on diagnostic facilities such as transfontanelar ultrasonography, CT scanning, and MR tomography. Early reduction and fixation of the damaged bony structures, if necessary, and a decompression and drainage of the cerebrospinal fluid are necessary. Considering the prerequisites for successful treatment, medical and surgical teams are required, and the decision should take into account systemic and general problems as well as particular factors and individual conditions. In the acute phase of the injury, it is not necessary to perform surgery simultaneously in all cases. In the first place, an attempt at an early diagnosis of the injury and a reduction of the fracture should be performed. The fluid-filled epidural and subdural regions should be evacuated as quickly as possible. In the case of complex injuries with serious brain damage and in associated injury situations, emergency surgery should be performed for more serious cases or for those in which adequate stabilization is not possible. There is no choice other than a total removal of the skull and the definite reconstruction. In borderline cases the individual situation should be evaluated in each case.

Factors influencing completion of delayed sternal closure among elderly patients undergoing cardiac surgery: results of a multicenter study. A complete sternal closure in patients undergoing cardiac surgery is one of the most important procedures of the surgical procedure to maintain the class of anesthetic risk. Elderly patients undergo cardiac surgery and are at a high risk of developing surgical complications associated with sternal infection. However, the mortality rate is lower in elderly patients than in younger patients. In previous reports, there have been many complications, including surgical wound de

Data Rev. 4th.This invention relates to a process for improving the performance of a waste water treatment process and, more particularly, to a process for remediating a waste water treatment process wherein the treatment plant effluent is intermittently conducted to a submerged device. In the treatment of wastewaters in surface impoundments, the quality of the effluent discharged by the treatment process is frequently improved by periodically re-introducing treated water to a system in which the stream of treated water, which previously passed through the system, is being discharged. This intermittent flow of treated water to the treatment system is typically performed in order to reduce the variance of the various parameters in the waste water treated to a particular level, thus improving the quality of the treatment process. For example, it is known to introduce treated water to a wastewater treatment plant system as a means of alleviating low oxygen conditions in an anaerobic process. An example of this type of system is disclosed in U.S. Pat. No. 4,634,541. This system includes a waste water treatment plant comprising: an inlet chamber, a first compartment, a second compartment, and an outlet chamber; a first inlet, a first outlet, a second inlet and a third inlet, which are connected to the first compartment; a second outlet, which is connected to the second compartment, and a third outlet, which is connected to the outlet chamber; means for removing solid waste from the stream of wastewaters entering the system; means for the production of substantially aerobic spent wastewaters which are discharged from the system to a disposal site; and means for separating a portion of the spent wastewaters from the effluents; a device submerged in the system of waters, having means for separating the portion of the spent wastewaters from the effluents; means for introducing 6d1f23a050
